John Justin Wyeth – Estate Planning Philosophy

All adults have some experience with death. A grand parent, parent, sibling, spouse or other relative, or a friend may have passed under any number of circumstances. It is a time of grief, mourning and a time for reflection. It is not a good time for taking care of important financial details and/or decisions. Yet, established societal norms have taught that there is no choice.

John Wyeth teaches that you do have a choice, and it's a lot easier than you might think. A choice to provide a plan that is developed while all are alive and well. A plan that is well understood. Understood by its maker and by those that survives the maker. A plan that allows abundant time for gentle and compassionate grieving to take precedence at the time of death -- because the decisions have already been made, and there is little left to do.

Experience has demonstrated the value of such a plan for the maker and for the beneficiaries, alike. The maker dwells in the satisfaction of a job well done, no loose ends left for others to tie up. The beneficiaries are freed from doubt, worry and uncertainty, and live confidently knowing what the future holds, even after the loss that they hope will never come.

For them, knowledge replaces worry, certainty replaces the unknown, and organization replaces chaos. Simply put, it's -- a plan. Avoiding probate, reducing costs including taxes, and safeguarding assets are just fortunate byproducts of the plan whose real value is summed up in one word – Peace.
